HISTORY

The Japanese wolf, also known as the Honshū Inu, is an extinct subspecies of the gray wolf that was once endemic to the islands of Honshū, Shikoku and Kyūshū in the Japanese archipelago.

It was one of two subspecies that were once found in the Japanese archipelago, the other being the Hokkaido wolf. Phylogenetic evidence indicates that Japanese wolf was the last surviving wild member of the Pleistocene wolf lineage (in contrast to the Hokkaido wolf which belonged to the lineage of the modern gray wolf), and may have potentially been the closest wild relative of the domestic dog. Many dog breeds originating from Japan also have Japanese wolf DNA from past hybridization.

Despite long being revered in Japan, the introduction of rabies and canine distemper to Japan led to the decimation of the population, and policies enacted during the Meiji Restoration led to the persecution and eventual total extermination of the subspecies by the early 20th century. However, well-documented observations of similar canids have been made throughout the 20th and 21st centuries; however, these observations have largely been of singular individuals, despite the Japanese wolf being known to have travelled in small packs, and the deciduous forests that the Japanese wolf relied on have been largely replaced with conifer plantations; thus, doubts persist over their identity.
